Abstract

By the revision of eight welfare-related laws, the welfare system in Japan was reorganised. In this change local governments of cities, towns and villages have responsibility to promote welfare schemes totally, comprehensively and intentionally. In this article the author analyses the relationship between the statutory and voluntary welfare of the past ten years from the point of community welfare. After this analysis the author discusses both roles and issues of voluntary welfare topics in the Health and Welfare Plan for the Aged which have become duties of all local governments.
